Folklore from Aruba, Curaçao & Bonaire

The long awaited Sambumbu collection by Pater Brenneker is finally published in four books. When living and working in Curaçao, Brenneker his interest grew in the history, culture, traditions and nature of the Dutch Caribbean islands. Together with his friend, public philosopher, artist and poet Elis Juliana (1927 – 2013), he collected all kinds of possible sources to document the culture and history as much as possible. Between 1969 and 1975 Brenneker published a ten-volume book series under the name Sambumbu.

WELCOME TO THE BOOKISH PLAZA eZINE

Summer is coming to an end, but not for the Caribbean reads. Lots of Caribbean authors have been published lately. Like the Sambumbu Collection by Pater Brenneker. These writings on the folklore of the ABC islands is a long time coming. Just check our section of New Books.

If you're looking for Cuban reads, the Guardian gives some great tips to take a tour through Cuba with three books.

It seems we can't get enough of Caribbean literature. The coming months our Events Calendar is once more packed up. From free your tongue at the Drongo Festival to reading Black USA in Holland and across the Atlantic one of the notorious Literary Festival's around; Festival de la Palabra in Puerto Rico soon to come. None of them to be missed. So check it out!

Last but not least, a short article on the fact that novelists from the Dutch Caribbean are not wide know in the Caribbean. How can we change this?

The next ezine will be out in October. Fine reading.

Cuba on our Literary Mind

Pushpinder Khaneka (The Guardian) suggests three "best books" on Cuba, offering "a literary tour of Cuba [that] takes in crime noir, a tale of love and loss set against the Cuban revolution, and a rich chronicle of the Caribbean island's history" with Cuba: A New History by Richard Gott, Havana Fever by Leonardo Padura, and Dreaming in Cuban by Cristina García.]

Novelists of Aruba, Bonaire, and Curaçao not known in wider Caribbean

GREAT BAY, St. Martin (June 16, 2017)—“A persistent ignorance about the Dutch Antilles literature exist among the English, Spanish, and French-speaking Caribbean.” That is how Emilio Jorge Rodríguez introduced a main idea of his paper, “Dutch Antilles Novelists and the Caribbean Literary Canon,” at the Caribbean Studies Association (CSA) conference in The Bahamas, June 7, 2017. The “persistent” challenge that the Cuban literary scholar pointed out is one that literary historians and reviewers such as Wim Rutgers, Fabian Badejo, and Hans Vaders have previously touched on. It explains in part why noted authors like Cola Debrot and Pierre A. Lauffer are not better known in St. Martin, in the wider Caribbean, and beyond, said Lasana M. Sekou, projects director at House of Nehesi Publishers (HNP). Rodríguez, whose books have been translated and published by HNP, has stepped up the discussion in his conference paper. “There is a confluence of Dutch, Papiamentu, Spanish, and English languages in the literary production of Aruba, Bonaire and Curaçao,” said Rodríguez.

However, “the barely dissemination, translation, and publishing” of the literature “requires a meditation about themes, styles, movements, and to establish links with the rest of the region,” said Rodríguez, one of three Caribbeanists on the CSA panel entitled “The Caribbean and the World.” According to Rodríguez, his paper is part of the endeavor to “create conscience in the academic field

“Rodríguez has been studying the literatures of the Netherlands colonies in the region for over 30 years. He is considered an expert on St. Martin literature; and is also well published by leading Cuban publishers,” said Sekou.
